March 12, 6:30 PM: Rick Rocamora presents U.S.-China Relations

China's entry into the World Trade Organization 25 years ago transformed the global economy and fueled China's rapid rise as a strategic competitor. Successive U.S. administrations have struggled to respond, adopting different economic and security strategies to counter China's growing influence, especially in Asia. This Great Decisions talk will compare the Trump and Biden approaches and explore what a second Trump administration could mean for U.S.-China relations.

March 19, 6:30 PM: Douglas Savage presents Too Many Cooks: A Recipe for Middle East Turmoil

Recent kinetic events in the Middle East have upended the status quo. Changes in relative power have prompted a new scramble for influence between countries in the region and beyond. We'll look at who's in the game and how it all may shake out.

March 26, 6:30 PM: John Katzka presents U.S. Foreign Policy in a World in Transition

Each year every President since 1986 has been charged to send a message to Congress on the state and intentions of the U.S. in a document called the National Security Study (NSS). Principally a Department of War action, it generally has little to do with the actual conduct of American foreign policy; in fact, in some years it wasn't done at all. This year is very different and this NSS is reflecting the changes the world is witnessing. We will look at those changes and how they may affect our lives.
